

The current regulatory rules affecting Low Power FM radio stations deprive urban communities across the country from access to local radio. The FCC should revise rules to allow more access to regular citizens across the country, which would increase a sense of community and togetherness in American cities, as well as give an alternative to the corporate stranglehold on our media.